ON 6TH APRIL, 1955

THE Council presents the Fifty-third Annual Report, with the Account of Receipts and Payments, for the year ending 31st December, 1954.

MEMBERSHIP:—The Council records with regret the deaths of the Rev. P. G. Langdon (elected 1951) and Brigadier Richard Wyatt (1947). Three members have resigned; but one former member has rejoined.

The Society's membership continues steadily to increase and has risen during the year from 168 to 181. The Council extends its welcome to the new members—Mrs. S. de Burlet, Mr. J. W. A. G. Strievenyns, the Hon. Claud Phillimore, Mr. J. Athelstane Stedman, Dr. Marion Coleman, Mrs. M. D. FitzRandolph, Messrs. A. A. Dibben, C. E. Welch, L. R. Morley, A. S. Poulton, P. R. Reid, J. Rendel Jones, F. O. Sprinks, F. K. Challen, M. C. Hay and Charles Agate. It is hoped that many more will join during the present and succeeding years.

FINANCE:—As shown in the Statement of Accounts, the balance in hand at the end of the year was £582 ls. 11d. (including £50 earmarked for Volume 55). It is satisfactory that over £83 was received from the sales of back volumes. This is good evidence that the interest and importance of the Society's publications is appreciated. The Council acknowledges with thanks donations of one guinea each from Mr. T. Gurney Stedman and Mr. L. E. Dolbear.

PUBLICATIONS:—Volume 54 (for 1954) was issued to members in February, 1955. This volume, The Quarter Sessions Order Book, 1642-1649, was produced at the joint expense of the Society and of the Records Committees of East and West Sussex, being published as No. 3 of the Record Publications of the two County Councils. The co-operation of these public bodies is gratifying evidence of the interest which they are taking in the historic past of the County. Members will agree that the editing of the Order Book reflects great credit on Mr. B. C. Redwood (Assistant Archivist, East Sussex Record Office) who also contributes a very valuable introduction. For the year 1955 the council proposes to issue a series of Ministers' Accounts for the Manor of Petworth, covering the period of the Black Death, to be edited by the Society's Hon. Secretary. This, it is hoped, will be followed in 1956 by a full transcript of the Lay Subsidies of 1524-5, edited by Mr. J. C. K. Cornwall. Other volumes envisaged for the future include the important Chartulary of Boxgrove Priory, and a selection of early Sussex Customals.

Copies of the Society's attractive Jubilee Volume of 192 eighteenth century Sussex Views can still be obtained by members at £1 11s. 6d.

COUNCIL AND OFFICERS.—The members of the Council offer themselves for re-election.

N.B.—Lists of the Society's Volumes already issued, and their prices, are printed at the beginning of each yearly volume. It will be seen that the stock of many volumes (indicated by an asterisk) is low, and some are out of print. In view of the demand for complete sets, and of the valuable contribution to our funds made by their sale, members who have any of these volumes which they do not require are asked to get in touch with the Hon. Assistant Secretary.

THE ROLLS

THE rolls of accounts printed in this volume are five in number, two of them being for 25 and 27 weeks respectively of the same financial year.

A.	Michaelmas	21 to	Michaelmas	22	Edward III	(1347-8)
B.	"	22 to	Lady Day	23	"	(1348-9)
C.	Lady Day	23 to	Michaelmas	23	"	(1349)
D.	Michaelmas	32 to	"	24	"	(1349-50)
E.	"	26 to	"	27	"	(1352-3)

They are all accounts presented by the reeve of the manor of Petworth, Roll E also containing the accounts for the subordinate manors of Sutton, Duncton, and Heyshott. Their particular interest lies in their covering the period of the Black Death, though there is unfortunately a gap between 1350 and 1352 for which no record is available. The first four rolls were recently sent to the West Sussex County Record Office, at Chichester, from the Essex C.R.O., to which they had apparently gone with some material relating to the Dawtrey family. My attention was called to them by Mr. G. H. Kenyon, who generously offered to have them photographed, so that I could work on them at home. The fifth roll, still among the muniments at Petworth House, was kindly lent to me by the present Lord Leconfield.

The Rolls A-D are in very good condition; in Roll E the second membrane of the Petworth account has been almost entirely torn away, and the latter part of the dorse of the first membrane is illegible.

The ideal way of presenting such records is by printing both Latin and translation; this was financially impracticable. To print the Latin only, while it would enable the editor to dodge certain difficulties, would render the volume almost useless to the great bulk of the members of the Society. They are therefore presented in translation. All personal and place names are given in the form in which they occur; dating feast days are rendered by the equivalents then and later in use, e.g. the Feast of Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary is Lady Day, and that of the Birth of St. John the Baptist is Midsummer. Otherwise the translation follows the text as exactly as possible, unusual or uncertain phrases being added in the original Latin. The more obscure words are given in a short glossary, but one of these perhaps deserves a special mention here. The adjective forinsecus, usually applied to expenses, is by most writers translated "foreign"—a meaningless term which simply passes the buck to the reader. It is connected with foris, meaning "outside," and in my opinion means "outside normal classifications"; I have therefore translated it "miscellaneous."

MANORIAL ACCOUNTING

Already by the middle of the thirteenth century estate management had been roughly standardized over a large part of the country on the lines laid down in various manuals, of which the most popular was that ascribed to Walter of Henley. A great landowner, such as Sir Henry Percy, who held the Honour of Petworth as well as wide estates in other counties, would be represented by his Seneschal, or Steward, in legal and administrative matters. For each manor, or small group of manors, there would be a Bailiff, who acted occasionally as deputy for the Steward in such matters as holding courts but was more an executive officer, having a general oversight of the agricultural operations, in the wider sense. But it was upon the Reeve (prepositus) that the actual working of the manor depended.

The Reeve was one of the villeins ("unfree" tenants owing "work services" for their land, who were in later times represented by the "copyholders") and was theoretically chosen by the unanimous consent of his fellows as the best and most enterprising husbandman among them; but we may suspect that the Bailiff and Steward had a considerable say in his election. He had to be a man of ability and energy, wise in every branch of agriculture and up to the tricks of all his subordinates. Of these latter the chief was the Repe-reeve (messor), on some manors called the Hayward (because he looked after the "hays" or hedges), who supervised the ploughing, sowing, reaping and storing of the crops and the mowing of the meadows. Then there were the villein tenants, who owed some two or three days' work every week at ploughing, harrowing, reaping, thrashing, or whatever the season demanded; occasional hired labour—doubtless from these same villein households; and finally the manor staff of servants (famuli). At Petworth this staff consisted normally of 4 ploughmen, a carter, a cowman, a shepherd and his assistant, a swineherd, and a gardener.

The Reeve had to account for a vast variety of payments and receipts in cash and in kind. This he would do by the production of written orders and receipts (from the Steward, Bailiff, or others) and particularly by tallies. The tally was a stick of wood, usually hazel, much like an ordinary piece of firewood as now sold in bundles, with parallel flat faces. Across the edge of the stick were cut notches of varying sizes to indicate sums of money or numbers of objects. The stick was then split lengthwise across the notches, the parties to the transaction each retaining one part; in the event of a dispute, the placing of the two parts would show whether the notches tallied or had been altered. The accounts as finally presented ran normally for a year, usually from one Michaelmas to the next, and were engrossed by the Clerk, generally the same who kept the records of the manorial courts. It would be most exceptional for any Reeve to be able to write. Men's memories were better before they took to committing their actions to writing, and within living memory an illiterate farm bailiff has been accustomed to recite, with the aid of a notched stick, all the details of several weeks' work; but it seems obvious that a whole year's work was more than any man's mind could carry and that there must have been some form of rough drafts and memoranda compiled from time to time.

The exact pattern of the account was standardized at an early date and will be found in our rolls to follow very closely that given in a Formulary¹ compiled in 1440 for the guidance of manorial clerks. The first entry is "Arrears," the amount in which the reeve was in debt on the previous year's account. Then come the "assized" or established rents (which, says the Formulary, are to be checked with the "extent," or rental), new rents, and "farms," or leases. Then come the "issues of the manor," under which head can be entered all sales except those of corn and cattle. The Formulary adds the caution—"see here and in other places that the amounts of the sales infra and extra agree." In accounting the face of the roll, on which all receipts and expenses are entered, is known as infra and the dorse, or back, of the membranes, on which are details of the stock, live and dead, as extra, being outside when the membranes are rolled up. Thus, for instance, the sale of so many quarters of barley will appear infra as producing so much money, and extra as accounting for that amount of the total crop: obviously, if the two entries do not agree the accountant will get into trouble. Under "sales of corn" the clerk is told to see that dates and details are given and that they agree in all points with the rolls and tallies. The Formulary adds:—"Instrue prepositum si nesciat et fuge turbas," which suggests that the accounts were drafted in the presence of a crowd whose comments and interjections, well-meant or not, might make it difficult to "explain things to the reeve." "Sales of live stock" must be entered in separate categories corresponding to the entries extra. Money arising from "pleas of the manor courts," and a general heading of "miscellaneous (forinseca) receipts" complete the receipts, except for the "vendicio super compotum." "Note that under this heading (panello) shall be put every amount disallowed." In the rolls here printed it will be noticed that under many of the classified paragraphs the auditors correct the reeve's figures and that at the end of each such paragraph the total correction is recorded as "sold, or charged, against (super) the account." It was the sum of these totals, which could only be entered after the audit, that formed the last entry before the grand total of the receipts.

On the expense side the first item is for "allowances and default of rents," which include the remission of the reeve's own rent during his term of office. Then follow the costs of ploughs and carts, buildings and mills, parks, the sheep-run, purchases of corn and livestock, labour hired for general purposes and especially during the harvest season, salaries and wages, and other miscellaneous expenses. A note of the amounts handed over in actual cash to the lord's Receiver or other officials brings this side of the account to an end, the grand total of expenses and allowances being set against the total receipts to show how much was owing to, or more usually by, the reeve.

On the dorse of the roll (extra) is entered in detail an inventory of the corn and livestock, hides, wool, etc., showing what was in hand (rem') at the beginning of the year, the amounts of produce or issues (de exitu) by way of crops or births, quantities bought or sold (as recorded infra), and other additions and subtractions, with a note of what remained in hand.

THE AUDIT

If it was an essential of a good reeve that he should be up to all the tricks of his subordinates, it was axiomatic that he himself would be, in another sense, up to his tricks. The examination of his account by the Auditors, apparently two in number, was no idle formality. Every item was scrutinized to the last peck of quantity or penny of value, and if he could not produce evidence to support his figures the deficit would be "charged against the account (vend' super compotum).” Our rolls are full of the auditors' corrections and comments, marginal or interlined, recognizable by a difference in the ink.

AGRICULTURAL DETAILS

It is not possible here to deal at length with the history of farming at Petworth in the fourteenth century; and, indeed, any such attempt based on so short a series of accounts would almost certainly be misleading; but certain features may usefully be noted. The demesne of Petworth at this time included rather over 200 acres of arable; of this none was used for wheat, and only some 10 acres (all in "Brugfeld," near the bridge over the Rother in the south of the parish) for barley. Some 45 acres carried rye, and about 160 acres, or 75 per cent. of the whole, oats; there is no mention of the mixed crops, meslin and dredge. In addition to the ordinary "small" oats a few acres of "large oats (grossa avena)" were grown, but what was meant by this term I have been unable to discover. Seed was sown at the following rates to the acre: oats $6\frac{1}{2}$ bushels, rye $2\frac{1}{2}$, and barley $4\frac{1}{2}$. The yields during these years were low, being roughly in the neighbourhood of one quarter (8 bushels) per acre for each type of grain; in 1350 the barley crop was less than had been sown. Against each crop entry the auditors noted in the margin the proportion of the yield to the seed sown:—"It answers for (i.e. yielded) 3 qr. 7 bz. more than three times itself (r' iij qr. vij bz. plus se tertio)"; "It answers for 4 qr. $5\frac{1}{2}$ bz. more than the seed (r' iiiij qr. v bz. di' plus semine); "It answers for 1 qr. 1½ bz. less than twice itself (r' minus j qr. j bz. di' se altero)"—and so on. By consulting a series of these entries they could gauge whether the land was being properly cultivated. On the manors of the Cathedral Priory of Winchester¹ the responsio was a fixed "normal" yield, bearing a definite proportion to the seed sown, and the reeve was expected to attain this or to make up any deficiency. This does not seem to have been the practice at Petworth before the Black Death, but in Roll E, for 1352-3, which was an exceptionally bad harvest year when the pease failed completely and the barley crop was less than had been sown, the unfortunate reeve was charged with 4 qr. 1½ bz. of barley and 1½ qr. of pease to cover the deficiency between the crops and the seed sown. At Sutton (p. 77) the reeve had to bring up the yield of barley to twice the amount of the seed, as did the reeve of Duncton (p. 84), who had also to pay for no less than 14 qr. of oats to bring that crop up to one and a half times the seed; the reeve of Heyshott also had to make up deficiencies in both barley and oats, because "the Lent sowing of corn failed in this district this year" (p. 90).

Under each variety of corn was entered the total amount received, from crops and by purchase, and its disposal—so much for seed, so much for "liveries" or allowances for the food of the household, so much for fattening pigs, and so on.

It is curious that although the expenses of mowing 21½ acres of meadow at Petworth and of spreading and collecting the hay are recorded each year, no hay is listed among the crop returns; nor is there any reference to the title of hay, which in 1340 amounted to 5 marks for the whole parish.² But the tithe of corn, which came to 18 marks (again, for the parish), is also ignored—except for an order on Roll D (1349-50) that in future the tithe sheaves of each kind of corn should be noted. This omission was probably because the "tenth sheaf" was collected on the field by the rector's agent, whereas the tithes of fleeces, lambs and pigs, which are duly recorded, would have to be delivered from the farm.

The livestock was graded according to age and sex. According to the Formulary—"A female calf in its first year is just a female calf (vitula fe); in its second year a young heifer (juvencula); in its third a heifer (juvenca); and in its fourth a cow. A male calf in its first year is a calf (vitulus); in its second a yearling (boviculus); in its third a steer (bovettus); and in its fourth an ox or bull. A lamb in its first year is a ewe lamb (agna); in its second a *jerc*³; in its third a ewe. A male lamb in its first year is just a lamb; in its second a hogget (hoggaster); in its third a wether (multon) or a ram (hurlardus). The number of each class "in hand," remaining from the previous year, was first noted; and then the number added from the class below and subtracted for addition to the class above:—e.g. there might be six young heifers in hand, all of which were, during the year, moved up to the heifer class, while five calves took their place. The numbers bought and sold, as recorded on the face of the roll (ut infra), were noted; also how many had died of “murrain (in morina),” a vague term for any fatal disease; all such deaths had to be presented at the next three-weekly court, and to be proved at the audit by reference to the court rolls.

It is noteworthy that at Petworth there were no wethers. This is explained by reference to our Roll E, which includes the stock accounts for Sutton, Duncton and Heyshott, which show that the castrated hoggets were sent from Petworth to these manors, of which the first two maintained only wethers, while Heyshott had both wethers and ewes. This custom of concentrating the ewes and wethers on separate manors is borne out by the stock returns for the Earl of Arundel’s manors some fifty years later.¹

The swine were classified as porci, full grown pigs, including boars and sows; porculi, which I have translated as “piglets,” though perhaps “shoats” would be technically more correct; and porcelli, or sucking pigs. They formed by far the most important source of meat for the household; in 1347–8 out of 104 pigs 60 were killed for the larder, 34 of the resulting bacons being sold; next year 22 out of 42, and in the following year 44 out of 163. For the curing of these the quantity of salt used was at the rate of a bushel to three pigs. Apparently they liked their bacon salt at Petworth; for the Formulary expressly states—“See that the reeve does not buy more salt than is needful; namely, for 4 large carcasses of oxen half a quarter; for 4 smaller 3 bushels; for 8 carcasses of sheep 1 bushel; for 4 large bacon carcasses 1 bushel; and for 6 smaller 1 bushel.” Of the traditional Martinmas slaughter of cattle, or indeed of the use of beef, there is very little evidence; though in 1349 there were 3 cows killed “for the larder” between Lady Day and Michaelmas, and 5 more cows (out of 60) and 8 oxen (out of 28) between that and the following Michaelmas. Beef would no doubt have figured more largely if Lord Percy and his retinue had been in residence; but he seems rarely to have visited Petworth during the period covered by our accounts, being either in the North or at London—to which city, incidentally, some of the venison captured, and salted, here was sent. There is one entry, in Roll A, of 183 rabbits being supplied to the household, and one supposes that they figured frequently in the kitchen if not in the accounts, as there are many mentions of the “Conynghre” or rabbit warren.

Besides the warren there were two Parks, which were used partly for deer and partly for grazing cattle and horses. Within the Great Park there was a garden, for which some 250 young apple trees and 24 pears were obtained in 1347. Most of these apples were no doubt for the cider, of which considerable quantities were produced. A short account roll of Richard Goslyn, gardener,¹ for 1375-6 lists 1 qr. 1 bz. of "genetz" pears sold at 4d. the bushel, and 1½ bz. of "Wardonns" sold for 14d. The same account mentions two herb gardens, one beside the warren and the other beside the "colehouse" (where charcoal and other fuel was kept), and the purchase of onion, leek, and "wort" or cabbage seed, and also hemp. The garden at Duncton produced walnuts. There is one reference (in Roll A) to vines "beside the counting-house," but whether any of the wine occasionally mentioned was home-grown does not appear.

To get any precise idea of how far the manor was a source of profit is difficult. For 1347-8 the receipts (ignoring arrears) were, in round figures, £215, expenses £58, leaving a balance of £157; for 1348-9 receipts were £165, expenses £80, and balance £85; for 1349-50 (during the Black Death) receipts were £115, expenses £53, and balance £62. For 1352-3 the details of expenses are lost, but receipts were £158. All these figures should be multiplied by about 35 to give a rough estimate of their equivalent in modern money. Detailed as the accounts are, certain items seem to have escaped notice; hay has already been referred to, and poultry and cheeses are also missing. It is, however, clear that the estate must normally have yielded a substantial revenue.

THE BLACK DEATH

The catastrophic visitation of plague, known as the Black Death, which swept across Europe between 1346 and 1350 naturally made a fearful impression upon contemporary chronicles. Where they attempt to give actual figures of the mortality they exaggerate preposterously, killing off more than the total population, for no statistics were available to them. But the general picture is credible, and it seems probable that in England something approaching a third of the humbler population, including the clergy, died—the death rate among the wealthier classes seems to have been very much lower. It must also be borne in mind that the incidence of the plague varied greatly in different places. According to a return for "the Honour of the Eagle" (practically equivalent to the Rape of Pevensey) made in 1440 the plague (doubtless including the later recurrences in 1362 and 1379) had resulted in nine villages near the coast being completely destroyed and rendered desolate and, combined with the flight of survivors, the total population of the Honour falling to a quarter of its former size.² Recent excavations on the site of the "lost village" of Hangleton suggest that this settlement was probably depopulated and abandoned at this time.

² V.C. H. Sussex, II, 182. Cf. Wiston and Erringham, where about half the customary tenants seem to have been wiped out: S.A.C. lili, 180-1.

The plague entered England through a Dorset port early in July, 1348. It seems to have reached Bosham about the end of September, and between then and July, 1349, after which no deaths are recorded, at least 34 tenants of the manor died; in two cases the wife died shortly after her husband, but if she had not survived him long enough to be admitted to the holding her death would not have been recorded.¹ The court rolls were only concerned with actual tenants; if the tenant's wife and four or five children died with him, their deaths would not be entered. It is noticeable that in seven instances no one put in a claim to be heir to the deceased, which suggests that no member of the family survived. In the neighbouring manor of West Thorney,² a very small manor with only about 80 acres of demesne and as much of copyhold and apparently about ten customary tenants, no deaths were recorded in the year ending at Michaelmas, 1348, but during the following year seven heriots were received on the death of tenants. During the year Michaelmas, 1349 to 1350, the reeve and two tenants died; but whether their deaths were directly, or indirectly, due to the pestilence cannot be determined.

In the centre of the southern portion of Sussex on the Abbey of Battle's large manor of Alciston,³ extending into several parishes, no deaths were recorded before Michaelmas, 1348. At the court held on 14 April, 1349, there were 24 deaths of tenants recorded; between that date and 10 June 39, and between then and 1 August another 14. By Michaelmas the plague seems to have worked itself out. Records for subsequent years suggest a normal death rate of about three tenants yearly in this manor. In the east of the county at Wartling⁴ no deaths had occurred as late as 9 October, 1348, but between that date and 28 October, 1349, no fewer than 62 were recorded. Soon after that the visitation ceased, and no deaths appear at the Christmas court.

It must again be emphasized that all these figures show only the minimum number of deaths, ignoring persons who did not hold land. Some hint of the reality may be obtained from the fact that at Wartling in two instances a man's death was swiftly followed by that of his wife, in three by that of his heir, and in one by the successive deaths of a son and a daughter. Moreover, in 12 out of those 62 cases no heir appeared to claim the land; at Alciston out of 77 cases 48 holdings were unclaimed.

To obtain a real idea of the mortality, even among the actual tenants, one requires a contemporary rental (none such appears to exist for any Sussex manor) and a complete series of court rolls covering the period of the pestilence and recording the deaths of tenants. For Petworth, unfortunately, we have only the Account Rolls here printed from which to draw our picture. Perhaps the most astonishing feature is how nearly business was as usual. It would be possible for a casual reader to run over the face of the rolls (receipts and expenses) and hardly realize that the plague had struck Petworth in September, 1348, and raged for about a year. It is true that the market, the fishery of Coultershow, and the manorial dairy were not leased in 1349 "because of the mortality of the people," that there were a number of rents in default for lack of tenants, and that the wages of the smith and of labour hired for sheep-shearing, mowing, and harvest work were high "because of the pestilence"; but there is no such dramatic statement as we find at Chalvington,¹ where costs were up "in view of the extreme scarcity of the staff (pro ingente parcite famulorum) from the great pestilence, through which scarcity, for lack of herdsmen, the corn growing in the fields was badly ruined and devoured." There is at Petworth one revealing entry, that the usual render of capons for "chevage"—a payment by villeins for leave to live outside the manor—was not received because "the young men took land; and they died in the pestilence." This shows that villeins who left the manor did so because there was no land available for their use; when holdings fell vacant they came back. It is not quite clear whether the entry means that those who returned had died or, as is more likely, that some had not returned because they were dead.

It is only when we turn to the dorse of the rolls that we learn, from the returns of livestock, of the ravages of the Black Death. Almost all holdings, with the exception of the smallest cottage tenements, owed a "heriot" of the best cloven-hoofed beast on the death, or surrender, of the tenant. At Petworth during the whole year Michaelmas 1347-8, only four heriots are recorded—or five if we include the Prior of Portsmouth Hospital, whose manor of Stedham was held of Petworth. Between Michaelmas, 1348, and Lady Day, 1349, there were 17, and from then to Michaelmas, 1349, another 41; during the whole of the following year none was received, and in the year 1352-3 only one. There were, therefore, during the period of the plague at least 60 deaths. To these we must add the unrecorded deaths of tenants from whom no heriot was received. At Wartling 14 per cent. of the tenants who owed heriot did not pay one "because they had no beast"; at Alciston the proportion was 26 per cent.; we may, therefore, reasonably assume that at Petworth there were at least 70 deaths in this class of tenant. In addition, there is attached to Roll D a schedule of rents unpaid from 30 cottages and small holdings, all of which were "formerly of" some tenant whose name does not appear among those paying heriots. These must represent tenements of which not only the holders but, in most cases, their heirs had died. We can thus say with certainty that about 100 heads of households died, and if wives and dependants are included the total death roll must have been nearer 300 than 200—an astounding figure for this one manor and parish (the two were roughly equivalent). What was the population before the Black Death? I know of no way of finding out. To the subsidy of 1332 there were in Petworth, in addition to Sir Henry Percy, 42 contributors. How far down the social scale did this tax extend? It clearly varied at the caprice of the local assessors; here no one was taxed at less than one shilling—representing goods worth 15s., quite a substantial sum; but in other villis in the county assessments of 2d., or even 1d., occur. At Petworth there must have been a substantial body of inhabitants whose names did not appear on the tax roll, because of their poverty. In passing it may be observed that of the names of those yielding heriots only six are identical with names on the Subsidy Roll, though in another seven cases the same surname occurs in both lists.

It is a point of some economic interest that the losses which the lord of the manor incurred through the shortage and increased cost of labour must have been partly set off by the amount of livestock which came to him as heriots. At Petworth these amounted to 8 horses, 6 mares, 14 oxen, 17 cows, 6 heifers, a bull and a steer, 6 ewes, a ram and a sow, of which the total value would have been getting on for £30. At Alciston the figures were 2 horses, 4 mares, 16 oxen, 7 cows, 5 steers, 3 wethers, a ewe, and 8 pigs; at Wartling 8 horses, 2 mares, 15 oxen, 8 cows, 4 heifers, and 3 pigs. While it might have been supposed that he would have raised the rents of the holdings which had lapsed into his hands when he re-let them, this does not seem to have been done; the rents were evidently fixed by the custom of the manor, as the total from this source, a little over £60, was the same in 1352-3 as it had been in 1347-8. That the pestilence caused considerable disorganization in the manorial economy may perhaps explain the absence of surviving Ministers' Accounts for 1350-2 (a similar gap seems not infrequent on other manors) and, in conjunction with a very bad season (see p. xxix), the fall in total receipts to £158, as compared with £215 in the last year before the Black Death. There certainly seems to have been an attempt to tighten up the administration of the manor, but with what success cannot be deduced from the rolls here printed.
